

Dies Natalis

When I was cat, my mistress tossed me sweetmeats from her couch. Even the soldiers were deferential – she thought me sacred – I saw my sleek ghost arch in their breastplates and I purred my one eternal note beneath the shadow of pyramids.

The world then was measured by fine wires which had their roots in my cat brain, trembled for knowledge. She stroked my black pelt, singing her different, frantic notes into my ear.

These were meanings I could not decipher. Later, my vain, furred tongue erased a bowl of milk, then I slept and fed on river rats . . .

She would throw pebbles at the soil, searching with long, gold nails for logic in chaos; or bathe at night in the moon's pool, dissolving its light into wobbling pearls.

I was there, my collar of jewels and eyes shining, my small heart impartial. Even now, at my spine's base, the memory of a tail stirs idly, defining that night.
Cool breeze. Eucalyptus. Map of stars above which told us nothing, randomly scattered like pebbles.

The man who feared me came at dawn, fought her until she moaned into stillness, her ringed hand with its pattern of death, palm up near my face.

Then a breath of sea air after blank decades, my wings applauding this new shape. Far below, the waves envied the sky, straining for blueness, muttering in syllables of fish. I trod air, laughing, what space was salt was safe. A speck became a ship, filling its white sails like gulping lungs. Food swam.

I swooped, pincered the world in my beak, then soared across the sun. The great whales lamented the past, wet years away, sending their bleak songs back and forth between themselves. I hovered, listening, as water slowly quenched fire. My cross on the surface followed, marking where I was in the middle of nowhere . . .

Six days later found me circling the ship. Men's voices came over the side in scraps. I warned patiently in my private language, weighed down with loneliness.
Even the wind had dropped. The sea stood still, flicked out its sharks, and the timber wheezed.

I could only be bird, as the wheel of the day turned slowly between sun and moon. When night fell, it was stale, unbearably quiet, holding the breath of the dead.

The egg was in my gut, nursing its own deaths in a delicate shell. I remember its round weight persistently pressing; opening my bowel onto the deck near a young sailor, the harsh sound my cry made then.

But when I loved, I thought that was all I had done.
It was very ordinary, an ordinary place, the river filthy, and with no sunset to speak of. She spoke in a local accent, laughing at mine, kissed with her tongue. This changed me. Christ, sweetheart, marry me, I'll go mad. A dog barked. She ran off, teasing, and back down the path came Happen you will . . .

Afterwards, because she asked, I told her my prospects, branded her white neck. She promised herself in exchange for a diamond ring. The sluggish water shrugged past as we did it again. We whispered false vows which would ruin our lives . . .

I cannot recall more pain. There were things one could buy to please her, but she kept herself apart, spitefully guarding the password. My body repelled her. Sweat.
Sinew. All that had to be hunched away in nylon sheets.

We loathed in the same dull air till silver presents came, our two hands clasping one knife to cut a stale cake. One day, the letter. Surgery. When the treatment did not work, she died. I cried over the wishbone body, wondering what was familiar, watching myself from a long way off.

I carried the remains in an urn to the allotment, trying to remember the feel of her, but it was years, years, and what blew back in my face was grey ash, dust.

Survivor

For some time now, at the curve of my mind, I have longed to embrace my brother, my sister, myself, when we were seven years old. It is making me ill.

Also my first love, who was fifteen, Leeds, I know it is thirty years, but when I remember him now I can feel his wet, young face in my hands, melting snow, my empty hands. This is bereavement.

Or I spend the weekend in bed, dozing, lounging in the past. Why has this happened? I mime the gone years where I lived. I want them back.

My lover rises and plunges above me, not knowing I have hidden myself in my heart, where I rock and weep for what has been stolen, lost. Please.
It is like an earthquake and no one to tell.

M-M-Memory

Scooping spilt, soft, broken oil with a silver spoon from a flagstone floor into a clay bowl –

the dull scrape of the spoon on the cool stone, lukewarm drops in the bowl –

m-m-memory.

Kneel there,
words like fossils
trapped in the roof of the mouth, forgotten, half-forgotten, half-recalled, the tongue dreaming it can trace their shape.

Names, ghosts, m-memory.

Through the high window of the hall clouds obfuscate the sun and you sit, exhaling grey smoke into a purpling religious light trying to remember everything perfectly

in time and space where you cannot.
Those unstrung beads of oil seem precious now, now that the light has changed.
